

Worthwine Island Conservation Area

About This Area

Worthwine Island Conservation Area is in Andrew County, southwest of Amazonia. Visitors can reach the area by taking the Amazonia/Route K exit off Interstate 229, traveling north on Route K nearly two miles and then west three miles on gravel road 392.

The Conservation Department purchased 28 acres along the Missouri River in 1989. Additional purchases have brought the area to its present 584 acres. The property was acquired in order to preserve unique wetlands and habitats associated with the Missouri River and to provide public lands and recreational opportunities in northwest Missouri.

The area was an island before the U.S. Corps of Engineers channelized the Missouri River.

Early exploration and settlement of this area began with the Lewis and Clark expedition in 1804. Journal entries from that expedition mentioned an abundance of wildlife along the broad marshlands of the heavy bottomland timber near the Missouri River. This area was part of the Platte Purchase, arranged by the U.S. government with the Indians in 1836.

This area is managed for a wide range of game and non-game wildlife species and is available to the public for a variety of outdoor activities.

Management of the area consists of restoring bottomland hardwoods through tree planting, developing riparian corridors through planting and natural revegetation and developing wetland habitat.

Things To Do

- Hunting. The area supports good numbers of deer and fair numbers of squirrel and rabbits. Old river sloughs provide good waterfowl hunting when river levels are high.

- Camping. No special facilities are provided.
- Hiking. Gravel or field roads provide good hiking opportunities.
- Nature study and birdwatching. Fall and spring are excellent times to view migrating waterfowl and various predatory birds, such as the bald eagle.
